SUBJECT: EMERGENCY PACKET COMMUNICATIONS - Part 2/2

Never, please, never send messages from a keyboard in real time. This can hold up the entire system by preventing other stations from moving traffic in the shortest possible time. Accuracy and speed are the attributes that elevated Amateur radio from a nice-to-have emergency communications resource to must-have, in many jurisdictions. The goal in state level RACES, for example, is to maintain an exchange of the maximum amount of letter perfect traffic in the least transmission time per message. Until the advent of packet in California, for example, no Amateur Radio mode met this need. State and county emergency operating centers everywhere should install one or more packet radio terminals.

It is recommended that a voice frequency be established between the various packet radio terminals for use used as a coordination or "order wire" channel. This can be most useful in solving technical problems quickly and for giving quick replies to some packet messages. Just because a message was received by packet does not mean that it is chiseled in stone that a reply must also be by packet. Whereas it may be deemed appropriate that a written (packet) reply be made for the record, a voice radio reply will be faster and more appreciated -- the written reply can follow later.
